Dear Annie:

I am 15 years old and I love your column. Here's my problem: Ever since I was a little girl, I had one dream -- to become an astronaut. I would gaze at the stars for hours each night, and I learned everything I could from books.

However, my parents have always drilled into me that I was to become a doctor or lawyer. They are very strict, and I always have obeyed them. I believe they do this for my benefit. My parents grew up poor. They want me to make heaps of money so I will want for nothing.

Whenever I bring up the topic of becoming an astronaut, they quickly shut it down, because they don't believe astronauts earn enough. My parents will never support me in this. I have only one path, already drawn, complete with college courses and job openings. My parents see their friends' children becoming lawyers, surgeons or specialists, and they expect me to do the same. Even my teachers and friends give me doubtful looks when I tell them what I want to do.

But let's say that I cut ties with my parents and take college classes in physics and astronomy and don't get into NASA. Medicine is a solid field. You can find jobs anywhere. Shoot for the stars? Very funny. Do I live for myself or my parents?
